

Tumor lysis syndrome occurs when tumor cells are destroyed by chemotherapy, resulting in the release of uric acid, potassium, and phosphate. It most commonly is associated with hematologic cancer such as acute lymphoblastic leukemia. The effects are particularly severe when accompanied by renal compromise. The elevated phosphate level can also result in a secondary hypocalcemia.

Hines RL, Marschall KE. Stoeltings Anesthesia & Co-Existing Diseases. 6th ed. New York, NY: Churchill-Livingston; 2012: 498.

Copyright 2015 Prodigy Anesthesia, Inc. It is unlawful to copy, distribute, and/or sell this material.